A TEMPTATION.

"I fail to see how the retention of things found can be called theft," said Mrs. Andrews in a passionate though firm voice. "If the object found is the property of a poor man who would be ruined by its loss, we ought to return it if we know the owner. If we do not know him, why should we deliver the treasure to the police merely to increase the dead capital of the city or the state? But if the object found is owned by a rich man who does not feel, nor e rich man who does not leed, nor even perceive the loss greatly, why should I not keep a treasure which will relieve me of the cares and anxiety of the morrow? It would be a godsend to me and hardly a loss to the former owner.

"You are wrong, damnably wrong," replied Mr. Andrews in a trembling voice, unable to repress the discomfort which the objectionable ideas of his wife caused him. "By all the principles of common law, and by a pure code of ethics, property found is hardly better than property stolen. He who retains what he finds is liable to be prosecuted as a thief. But if that was otherwise, your conscience ought to tell you that appropriating what is not your own is only one degree less culpable than burglary or highway robbery."

"That is the very point where I differ with you" ranking these hadeses in the second of the property of the property."

"That is the very point where I differ with you," replied Mrs. Andrews in the same tone of voice as before. "It is not a moral principle that my neighbor should be enormously rich and that I should see him wallow in luxury and feel myself the pangs of hunger day by day."

"True, not of actual hunger." she continued, "but how many an anxious discussion have we not had all these years of our married life looking out for means to keep the wolf from our door. No, my dear; do not talk of morals in such a case, or rather true morality teaches as a fundamental principle the laws of self preservation, which says to man and animal that it is essential to take the means of life wherever they are found, so long as we do not rob another being of the means of support. To keep what you find, if the object does not deprive another of the means of livelihood, is morally right. All that is requisite is to be circumspect, to escape the meshes of the law, and to have the moral strength to face the looks and gossip of other people without betraying your secret." gossip of other people without betray-ing your secret.

Mr. Andrews grew more and more excited. During the lest speech of his wife he had risen and taken his hat. His daughter Ann, a kindly, fresh looking girl of about twenty-one years, had also got up and tried to pacify her father.

mean what she says."

"I de not see why you should be so excited," said Arthur Brinks, a clerk in the First National bank of Cincinnati, for it was in that city that the conversation took place in a so-called summer garden where Mr. and Mrs. Andrews and her daughter were spending the balmy summer evening. Arthur Brink was betrothed to Ann. They had been for three years now and had no chance yet of getting married, the salary of Arthur being too small to provide a good home without going heavily into debt, which neither he nor his bride were disposed to do. Netther were the immediate prospects of Arthur very immediate prospects of Arthur very promising, and he had been despond-ing many a day in contemplating the advancing ages of both his bride and

"Now, Mr. Brink," interrupted Mr. Andrews, "stop that talk, or I shall have to look out for a man of sounder principles to associate with my daughter. Ideas as you were just about to utter will surely bring you to grief in the position you hold."

Mrs. Andrews uttered a few syllables in retert, when her husband interrupted her sharply. "Stop your talk," he cried, "we have aiready had too much of it in a public garden. Do you not see how everybody is staring us? Come, Ann, you go home with me." He led his daughter sway and Mrs. Andrews followed leaning on the arm of Arthur Brink. They continued their conversation in an animated way until they reached their home.

A short time after Arthur Brinks was sitting at his desk with a big ledger before him. It was shortly after dinner when the director of the bank entered the room where Arthur, with a number of colleagues, was at work. He had a heap of papers and letters in his hand when he came to Arthur's desk.

"I want to see the account of ...," said the director, putting his papers on said the director.

"I want to see the account of —," said the director, putting his papers on the desk. He examined the account and took some notes. Then he took up his papers again and proceeded on his roun

A few minutes later, on moving his ledger, Arthur saw a paper parcel stick-ing in his drawer, which was not prop-erly closed. The parcel was half inside of the drawer and half out. He looked at the writing on the paper and read $25,000. Without thinking or knowing what he did, he pushed the parcel into the drawer, which he shut. He was exceedingly excited. Ought he not to run and find the director to return the parcel which the chief had evidently dropped from his papers? Then the words of Mrs. Andrews resounded in his mind: "To keep what you find, if the object does not deprive another of the means of livelihood, is morally right." They fitted the case exactly; the director was enormously rich and so was the bank; neither would feel the loss.

When the time of heads

When the time of leaving came, Arthur took a number of papers, the weighty parcel among them, and put them into his pocket. He walked about for hours before going home intending to hide his treasure somewhere, but did not find a suitable place. So he took it home and placed it in his drawer. He had previously examined and found it to be a letter containing the sum of $25,000 in notes to bearer. If he cashed them in the morning, before the loss had been perceived and notice of it had been given to the banks, he might secure the treasure and keep it.

loved Ann, all of a sudden in his happiest moments, the word "Thief" would resound in his ears and startle him as if the police were already on his track. Before the night was over he was so utterly demoralized and affrighted that he would see a policeman in every corner of his room, a court-room in the center and himself as the accused in the dock. Before he left home in the morning he sat down and wrote a letter to the director of the bank stating that he had found the parcel in his drawer and had been so excited with the temptation of keeping it, and so completely unnerved that he had been unable to return it on the spot. But he now felt bound to return the letter and money. He said he would not sign the letter, requesting the director to keep the fact that he had withheld the treasure for a night a secret between them. But he wanted the director to know who had taken it in order to protect others from being suspected, to accomplish which he wrote in his natural handwriting and begged that his letter should be destroyed. With his own hand he threw the letter into the box of the director.

Arthur felt much relieved after this, yet far from satisfied with himself. He was restless and unable to work. About 11 in the morning a boy came, summoning him to present himself right immediately in the director's office. Arthur went pale and disconcerted. When he entered the office, the director gave him a look as serious as it was kindly and diately in the director's office. Arthur went pale and disconcerted. When he entered the office, the director gave him a look as serious as it was kindly and said: "Mr. Brinks, we are in want of a private secretary of a committee who must be absolutely trustworthy and honest and must write a clear and fine hand. Now, I have always known that you are utterly irreproachable as regards your honesty, and a happy occurrence has convinced me this morning that your handwriting is just asirreproachable as your honesty. I have now no longer the slightest doubt that you are just the man we want. Are you prepared to accept the position?"

Arthur was struck dumb. He was utterly unable to make a reply, and merely nodded his head in assent.

"All right," continued the director, "your present pay will be increased thirty dollars a week. You can enter upon your new duties in the morning."

Arthur was still speechless. He stretched out his hand which the director seized and shook cordially. Then Arthur gasped out: "I am unable to Arthur gasped out: "I am unable to work to-day, Can I—can I—have a holiday?"

"By all means, go. Compose yourself and come back in the morning ready to be introduced into your new office."

Arthur ran more than he walked away and hastened to the house of his Ann. He told her his change of circumstances, said that he would lay by the $50 every week for six months and at the end of that time they should get married. Ann ran to tell her mother who came in to embrace her future son. When the first courtesies were exchanged, Arthur said:

"Now, mother, let me tell you, you were wrong in what you said about keeping things found. To keep them is just as bad as to steal, and any man of conscience will know or feel it." Mother Andrews intending to reply, he cried; "No, no, it is no good talking, I will not listen. But believe me, mother, honesty is the best policy. I have got irresistible proof of it."
